Frequent flyers, especially business travelers, are more likely to have their luggage stolen, damaged, or lost while traveling. Acknowledging this reality is the first step in preventing it from happening. Fortunately, there are several tricks and modern inventions that can provide better protection for your luggage. One of the simplest ways to protect your suitcase is by personalizing it. While you might not want to show up at business meetings with a flashy or bedazzled suitcase, adding a small distinguishing trait can make your bag harder to spot among others. This could be as simple as tying a red ribbon on the handle, adding a business label on the front, or using strips of duct tape that can be easily removed. Another way to protect your luggage is by requesting a 'Fragile' sticker while checking in for your flight. Even if there's nothing fragile inside, this can deter baggage handlers from treating your bag roughly and give you an added layer of protection against damage. However, the most effective method is investing in TSA-approved padlocks that can be fastened to your bag's zippers. This should be your base level of security, accompanied by zip ties to further secure the zippers. Taking it a step further, encasing the entire suitcase in plastic wrap using a machine at the terminal adds an extra layer of protection and makes tampering easier to spot. Finally, including contact information on both the outside and inside of your luggage ensures that if someone takes your bag by mistake or finds it, they can return it to you. This includes attaching travel tags with your details but also ensuring there's a backup tag attached to the inside of your luggage for added security. This solution seems effective, allowing travellers to say 'Goodbye' to lost luggage with the help of StickNFind, a small sticker that can be attached to valuable items. The technology uses radar to track stolen items and sends alerts if they move more than 30 metres away from your phone. If an item is lost, the app can be used to locate its last known position and alert other users. A hardside suitcase is also recommended for protecting valuables during air travel. Travel insurance is crucial in case of loss or theft, with companies offering protection against various risks. Airport security staff advise fragile items to be checked at designated desks and carefully wrapped to prevent damage. Waiting for luggage to come off the carousel after a long flight is never a pleasant experience. It not only adds a delay to your total journey time but also leaves you wondering if your suitcase or other valuables have gone missing. Fortunately, some frequent flyer programs and premium airline tickets allow you to skip the queue, ensuring your cases are first out on the carousel. However, you don't have to pay more or stay loyal to a single airline to get your luggage prioritized before others. A simple trick involves applying for a "fragile" sticker, which can make a significant difference in getting your luggage back more quickly. When airport staff handle fragile items, they take extra care to avoid breaking them, and these bags usually come out first on the carousel. Another tactic is to check in last when boarding, as this places your luggage at the end of the bag cart, making it one of the first off the aircraft at your destination. However, this strategy may not suit those who prefer being on time.
